My editorship of the Japanese Journal of Political Science will end as of 31 December 2018. Please allow me to attempt a brief professional-cum-personal reflection on my editorial experience.

Introduction to Editing: When I landed at the Logan Airport in Boston in the summer of 1970 to pursue a graduate degree at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, I never imagined that I would be the editor of an academic journal 30 years thereafter. In the late 1990s, when Cambridge University Press approached me to undertake the task of editing a new journal in Tokyo, the idea was a challenge to me. By then, I had had some experience in journal editing, (1) International Organization under Peter J. Katzenstein (Ithaca) and Stephen D. Krasner (Palo Alto) in the 1980s, (2) Journal of Japanese Studies under Susan Hanley and the late Kozo Yamamura (Seattle) in the 1980s and 1990s, and (3) Government and Opposition under the late Ghita Ionescu (Manchester) in the 1990s. Also, by then, I had published a co-edited volume with Daniel Okimoto under Yasusuke Murakami's and Hugh Patrick's overall editorship in 1988 with Stanford University Press and my co-edited book manuscript with Michael Cox and G. John Ikenberry, American Democracy Promotion, had been accepted to be published in 2000 by Oxford University Press.

Editorial Team and Principles: The editorial team would not have been easy to form, if it had been confined to a Japanese search. Although the idea came through the Leviathan, a Japanese politics journal, I knew that they were not interested in undertaking the editing of the journal alone. Therefore, my team was an international one composed of those eminent scholars whom I had met through my editing experiences over the preceding 20 years. The first adjective attached to the journal does not mean that the geographical scope of the journal is Japan but that the editor is Japanese. The subjects the journal covers are open to political scientists from different schools of thought. One element that became clear through the journal's acceptance and eventual publication of articles is that it encouraged submitters to be deep rooted in their conceptualization, to be innovative in method, and to be interesting in their arguments.

Citations and Submissions: Nevertheless, what has come to count is citation frequency. Google Scholars Citation of articles and the impact factor of the journal came to our attention as well. Given American hegemony in the political science world, the journal never registered very high figures in this respect. However, a few years ago, the journal registered a surprising and welcomed impact factor: this journal registered an impact factor figure on par with its counterparts in Australia and Canada, two English-speaking societies. In terms of the source of submitting authors, the journal registered 40–50% from the United States and the European Union, 40–50% from Asia and the Indo-Pacific, and some 10% from Japan. This distribution is sound in the sense that Asian authors are on a steady rise, befitting the Asian century. The small size of Japanese authors is further limited by the less frequent mutual citations among Japanese authors in comparison to the far more frequent
